

GOLETT

SITUATED upon a hill as far from the haunts of men as a legation can be conveniently established, stands the home of a foreign representative to this country. It is a beautiful place within and without. Exquisite draperies hang from doors and windows, works of art adorn the walls, screens from Japan, tapestries from China, costly bric-a-brac and hand-carved furniture in rare designs from everywhere, fill the rooms of the house. The highly polished floors, covered here and there with silken rugs, seem purposely laid for the restless dancing feet of youth; but the patter of dainty feet, the soft swish of a woman's garments, is never heard. No girlish laughter breaks the stillness, no merry chatter fills the silence. The house, in its Oriental splendor, seems deserted save for the presence of the well-trained servants, who glide noiselessly about—silent, attentive, obsequious; or a suave attache who greets you courteously, bows you out diplomatically.

At the dinners and receptions which the minister purposes giving this winter no woman will preside, and yet there are women here, and young women, too—the daughter of the house and her young companion—bright-eyed girls of an age when life is sweetest and brightest, but into whose lives come none of the freedom that the young women of our own country enjoy. Shut in their apartments they see and hear nothing of the world without, and know no pleasures outside the narrow confines of a portion of the legation—a strange contrast to the strenuous lives of the young women around us; but, when one's in Rome, we ask, why not do as the Romans do, and as did their predecessor?

Minute Men Parade.

Friday evening the Thirteenth Regiment of Minute Men gave a public parade for the first time in regimental formation in the new buff and blue continental uniform and armed with flint-lock muskets. The two battalions selected to visit New York Tuesday left the armory, 333-41 Pennsylvania Avenue, at 8:30, under command of Col. M. A. Winter, accompanied by his staff, Adj. Gen. M. M.
